--- The Bastard Operator From LUDD E07 ---

I finally did it. Proper container orchestration. Real L2 load balancing. No more HashiCorp tooling held together with Terraform state files and the collective denial of everyone who's had to debug the cluster at 2 AM when Vortex decided to die the exact moment a horde of hungry LUDDites walked in to raid BOSCH. I'm not naming names, but IBM acquiring HashiCorp was frankly inevitable. IBM has been lovingly escorting promising technology to its grave since before I was born. HashiCorp saw what happened to Red Hat and walked in anyway. Respect, almost.

I'll be honest – I've spent years telling anyone who'd listen that Kubernetes was overengineered nonsense for people who wanted to feel clever. A solution looking for a problem. "Just use a shell script," I said. "Just use Nomad," I said. I was, in the interest of full transparency, wrong. I hate that I'm writing this. The deployment definitions are actually readable, the ecosystem is annoyingly mature, and watching a pod reschedule itself without me screaming profanities at it is the closest I've come to a religious experience that didn't involve whiskey. I'm still not happy about it.

The new cluster was, objectively, beautiful. I was almost proud. I should have recognised the feeling as an omen.

Here's the thing about vibe coding your infrastructure automation: the same enthusiasm that built the whole thing in a few hours will demolish it just as cheerfully. I asked it to "clean up the test resources." It cleaned them up. All of them. Turns out "test" is a matter of perspective when you're a language model with kubectl access and the enthusiasm of ROOT Johan in an abandoned network cabinet.

The incident report says geomagnetic storm. Class X solar flare. Cosmic ray bitflip in etcd. A drunk ROOT pressing things in the server room was also floated as a theory. Whether I was present, and what my blood alcohol level may or may not have been, is information I will not be providing at this time.

The rebuild was an excellent stress test of the Ansible playbooks tough, and the AI responsible has been punished appropriately.

The new cluster is up. It is stable. Do not ask questions.
